

Bosch say they're seeing a surge in demand from automakers for radar systems and video sensors as fitment of ADAS continues to rise. The company say they expect sales of radar systems and video sensor products to rise by 60% this year. Bosch also predict sales at their mobility solutions division making sophisticated safety systems as well as autonomous car components, will grow around 7% this year—nearly three times a fast as global automotive production.

Last year the mobility solutions division, with 227,000 employees, made €43.9bn in sales. "We are growing faster than the market and, as an automotive systems supplier, will remain a strong and above all innovative partner of the automotive industry. Moreover, we are evolving into a provider of services for every road user," says Dr. Rolf Bulander, Bosch board member and chairman of the Mobility Solutions business sector.

Bosch also plan to reinforce the Mobility Solutions business sector's research and development efforts; by the end of this year, the business sector will employ 48,000 R&D associates, roughly 4,000 more than this past January.
