

Automakers will soon be able to test self-driving vehicles on German roads. Germany is home to some of the world's largest car companies including Volkswagen, Daimler and BMW, all of whom are developing self-driving vehicles.

Companies around the globe are currently working on prototypes for self-driving vehicles, but such cars are not expected to be available for the mass market before 2020.

German industry leaders have pressed the government to introduce incentives to boost demand for electric cars, arguing such support is required if the country is to retain its prominent role as a car producer.
